It was here in the fields and water meadows around the River Eptea tributary of the Seine, that he came across wild varieties of plants that before long would populate both his paintings and his garden: natural carpets of irises and poppies and, in particular, small white water lilies, the motif he would come to find the most beguiling of all. Rudolf Adelbert Meyer. Participants were regularly enthusiastic about this painting's use of colourfocusing on the details the accompanying commentary on Veronese had brought to their attention, and remarking on the depth, vibrancy, and quality of the colour in the painting.

Faith still remained to me as irrational as it was before, but I could not but admit that it alone gives mankind a reply to the questions of life, and that consequently it makes life possible. In contradistinction to the way in which people of our circle oppose fate and complain of it on account of deprivations and sufferings, these people accepted illness and sorrow without any perplexity or opposition, and with a quiet and firm conviction that all is good.
