Although the central government sought to redistribute wealth in China, richer provinces seeking industrial maximisation were able to significantly determine spatial patterns of accumulation. By Xiaoyu Pu. Even the railroads became a burden.

Tianjin has been successful in attracting foreign investment, but has kept The existence of related and supporting industries as another determinant of competitive advantage is so far little documented in provincial studies. China also has large resources of fluorite fluorspar gypsum asbestos and has the world's largest reserves and production of cement clinker and limestone. Such projection assumes that the centre will continue to relinquish its support for individual provinces in the form of preferential policies or subsidies and instead provide a macro-economic framework designed to allow each province to maximise its own benefit under generally applicable rules.

The DPP has traditionally called for de jure independent Taiwan as a separate Register.
